

United States Court of Appeals
FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CIRCUIT

Argued October 22, 2021

Decided August 2, 2022

No. 21-5012

STEVEN M. LARRABEE,
APPELLEE

v.

CARLOS DEL TORO, IN HIS OFFICIAL CAPACITY AS SECRETARY OF THE NAVY, AND UNITED STATES,
APPELLANTS

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Columbia
(No. 1:19-cv-00654)

Cynthia A. Barmore, Attorney, U.S. Department of Justice, argued the cause for appellants. With her on the briefs were Brian M. Boynton, Acting Assistant Attorney General, and Sharon Swingle, Attorney.

Stephen I. Vladeck argued the cause for appellee. With him on the brief was Eugene R. Fidell.

A. Richard Ellis was on the brief for amicus curiae National Institute of Military Justice in support of appellee.

Joshua E. Kastenber and J. Wesley Moore, pro se, were on the brief for amici curiae in support of appellee.

Before: TATEL,* RAO, and WALKER, Circuit Judges.

Opinion for the Court filed by Circuit Judge RAO.+

Opinion concurring in part and dissenting in part filed by Circuit Judge TATEL.

RAO, Circuit Judge: Steven Larrabee, a member of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, pleaded guilty at a court-martial to the sexual assault of a civilian. In this collateral challenge to his sentence, Larrabee argues that the statutory grant of military jurisdiction over Fleet Marine Reservists exceeds Congress' authority to "make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces," U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 14 ("Make Rules Clause"), and that his "case[]" did not "aris[e] in the land and naval forces," id. amend. V ("Grand Jury Clause"). The district court held for Larrabee. We now reverse.

Whether a person may be subjected to court-martial jurisdiction turns "on one factor: the military status of the accused." Solorio v. United States, 483 U.S. 435, 439 (1987). Based on the Supreme Court's precedents interpreting the Make Rules Clause as well as the original meaning of that Clause, we hold that a person has "military status" if he has a formal relationship with the military that includes a duty to obey military orders. As a Fleet Marine Reservist, Larrabee was "actually [a] member[] or part of the armed forces," and therefore amenable to military jurisdiction under the Make Rules Clause. United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, 350 U.S.

* Circuit Judge TATEL assumed senior status after this case was argued and before the date of this opinion.

+ Circuit Judge WALKER joins the majority opinion as to all except Part III.

11, 15 (1955). We also hold that the Fifth Amendment’s Grand Jury Clause did not separately bar Larrabee’s court-martial.

A.

The Fleet Marine Corps Reserve is one part of the Marine Corps, alongside the Regular Marine Corps and the Marine Corps Reserve.¹ 10 U.S.C. § 8001(a)(2). Its name notwithstanding, the Fleet Marine Reserve is not a “reserve component” of the armed forces. See id. § 10101 (listing the military’s reserve components). Marine Corps reservists are part-time soldiers who maintain civilian jobs but who are trained like full-time troops and who may be ordered into active-duty service, if necessary. Id. §§ 10102, 12301(a)–(b). Membership in the Fleet Marine Reserve, by contrast, is a de facto retirement status for those who have previously served in active duty. See United States v. Begani, 81 M.J. 273, 275 (C.A.A.F. 2021) (recognizing that after a Marine’s transfer to the Fleet Marine Reserve, “for all intents and purposes, he [has] retired”) (cleaned up). A Marine becomes eligible to transfer into the Fleet Marine Reserve after serving in active duty for at least twenty years. 10 U.S.C. § 8330(b). After thirty total years of service, he is then formally retired.² Id. § 8331(a); see also id. § 8326(a). At any time after completing his required years of service—whether he is in active duty, a Fleet Marine

² By statute, Fleet Marine Reservists and formally retired Marines have similar rights and responsibilities. They are entitled to the same amount of pay, see 10 U.S.C. §§ 8326(c)(2), 8330(c)(1), and are both subject to ongoing service duties, see id. § 688(a)–(c). In this opinion, we use the term “military retiree” in its formal sense, to refer to persons on Marine Corps’ retired lists.

Reservist, or a retiree—a Marine may request to be discharged, which results in a “[c]omplete severance from all military status.” MARINE CORPS ORDER 1900.16, SEPARATION AND RETIREMENT MANUAL ¶ 1002.20 (2019) [hereinafter MCO 1900.16].

During the window between active duty and formal retirement, members of the Fleet Marine Reserve receive “retainer pay,” calculated based on their rank and years of service at the time of transfer. 10 U.S.C. §§ 8330(c)(1), 8333. They are also subject to ongoing military duties. In times of war or national emergency or “when otherwise authorized by law,” Fleet Marine Reservists “may be ordered ... to active duty without [their] consent” for the duration of the crisis, and up to six months thereafter. Id. § 8385(a). In peacetime, they agree to serve for up to twelve months in any two-year period, see id. § 688(a), (b)(3), (e)(1), and may be ordered into “active duty for training” for up to two months in any four-year period, id. § 8385(b). Finally, they must comply with administrative reporting requirements—they must inform the military if they change addresses, for instance—and are subject to restrictions on foreign employment.

Under the Uniform Code of Military Justice (“UCMJ”), Fleet Marine Reservists may be court-martialed. Id. § 802(a)(6). Congress has given the military courts jurisdiction over the Fleet Marine Reserve since 1925. See Act of Feb. 28, 1925, §§ 2, 10, Pub. L. No. 68-512, 43 Stat. 1080, 1080–81, 1083.

B.

The facts in this case are undisputed. After twenty years in active-duty service, Larrabee transferred to the Fleet Marine Reserve. He began working as a civilian employee on his former base in Iwakuni, Japan, and moonlighting as a manager at two local bars near the base. After a late night of drinking, Larrabee sexually assaulted an inebriated and unconscious bartender and filmed the encounter on his cell phone. His victim, the wife of an active-duty Marine, reported the assault to Military Police, who obtained the video from Larrabee's phone. The victim's husband was immediately reassigned to a posting in the United States. Larrabee was charged with "sexual assault" and "indecent recording" under the UCMJ. See 10 U.S.C. §§ 920(b), 920c(a)(2). He pleaded guilty at a court-martial and was sentenced to ten months' confinement and a dishonorable discharge.

Larrabee appealed to the Navy-Marine Corps Court of Criminal Appeals ("CCA"), arguing, as relevant here, that the UCMJ provision authorizing court-martial jurisdiction over members of the Fleet Marine Reserve, 10 U.S.C. § 802(a)(6), was unconstitutional. Military retirees, he argued, are not part of "the land and naval Forces" that Congress may place under the jurisdiction of courts-martial. U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 14. The CCA had recently held that personnel "in a retired status remain members of the land and Naval forces who may face court-martial," United States v. Dinger, 76 M.J. 552, 557 (N-M. Ct. Crim. App. 2017) (cleaned up), so it "summarily reject[ed]" Larrabee's challenge as well, United States v. Larrabee, 2017 WL 5712245, at *1 n.1 (N-M. Ct. Crim. App. Nov. 28, 2017). The Court of Appeals for the Armed Forces ("CAAF") summarily upheld his conviction without reaching the constitutional question at issue here. United States v. Larrabee, 78 M.J. 107 (C.A.A.F. 2018) (mem.), cert. denied, 139 S. Ct. 1164 (2019).

His direct appeals exhausted, Larrabee brought this collateral challenge to his sentence in the District Court for the District of Columbia. He argued that Section 802(a)(6) is facially unconstitutional because a Fleet Marine Reservist is

“for all practical purposes a civilian” and therefore not subject to regulation under the Make Rules Clause. See U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 14. In the alternative, even if the Fleet Marine Reserve is part of the “land and naval Forces,” Larrabee insisted his court-martialing was still unconstitutional under the Fifth Amendment’s Grand Jury Clause because his “case[]” did not “aris[e] in the land or naval forces.” Id. amend. V (requiring grand jury indictments for all “capital[] or otherwise infamous” crimes, “except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia”). Under the Grand Jury Clause, Larrabee argued, the military may not court-martial a retiree for an offense that bears “no connection to the armed forces.” Since he was accused of committing civilian crimes against a civilian on private property, the court-martial’s exercise of jurisdiction in his case was unconstitutional.

After both parties moved for judgment on the pleadings, the district court held for Larrabee. See Larrabee v. Braithwaite, 502 F. Supp. 3d 322, 333 (D.D.C. 2020). The central question, the court explained, was “one of status, namely, whether the accused in the court-martial proceeding is a person who can be regarded as falling within the term ‘land and naval Forces.’” Id. at 328 (quoting Kinsella v. United States ex rel. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234, 241 (1960)). Fleet Marine Reservists were part of the “land and naval Forces,” the court reasoned, only if subjecting them to court-martial jurisdiction was “necessary to maintain good order and discipline” within the military’s ranks. Id. at 331. Because “trial by military court-martial ‘was intended to be only a narrow exception to the normal and preferred method of trial in courts of law,’” the court held the government bore the burden of showing why subjecting persons in the Fleet Marine Reserve to court-martial jurisdiction was necessary. Id. at 327 (quoting Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 21 (1957) (plurality opinion)).

The government offered two reasons why subjecting Fleet Marine Reservists to court-martial jurisdiction was necessary to preserve military order and discipline, but the district court was persuaded by neither. First, the government argued that because they may be ordered into active duty “without [their] consent,” 10 U.S.C. § 8385(a), Fleet Marine Reservists remain a part of the nation’s fighting forces. Subjecting them to court-martial jurisdiction was therefore essential to uphold order in the military’s ranks. As the district court pointed out, however, under current military regulations “retirees are highly unlikely to be recalled.” Larrabee, 502 F. Supp. 3d at 331. Congress has extended court-martial jurisdiction over Marine Corps reservists only in narrow circumstances but has subjected members of the Fleet Marine Reserve to court-martial at all times. That discrepant treatment was fatal to any military necessity argument, in the court’s view.

Second, the government argued that Fleet Marine Reservists’ “retainer pay represents reduced compensation for [their] current part-time services,” but the court found this inaccurate because “military retirement benefits actually represent deferred pay for past services,” and irrelevant because the receipt of a military pension was not, standing alone, sufficient to place a person in the “land and naval Forces.” Id. at 330. Soldiers’ dependents are entitled to military benefits, and military contractors are often paid by the military, but neither class of persons may be court-martialed. Id. at 330–31 (citing Covert, 354 U.S. at 23, and McElroy v. United States ex rel. Guagliardo, 361 U.S. 281, 286 (1960), respectively). Finding none of the government’s arguments persuasive, the court held Section 802(a)(6) facially unconstitutional and did not reach Larrabee’s as-applied challenge. The government timely appealed.

II.

Our review of the district court’s judgment on the pleadings is de novo. Jones v. Dufek, 830 F.3d 523, 525 (D.C. Cir. 2016). The authority of a federal court to collaterally review a jurisdictional challenge to a conviction by court-martial is long established. See In re Grimley, 137 U.S. 147, 150 (1890) (“It cannot be doubted that the civil courts may in any case inquire into the jurisdiction of a court-martial, and if it appears that the party condemned was not amenable to its jurisdiction, may discharge him from the sentence.”). That authority persists even where the court-martial’s sentence was not custodial, or if the plaintiff is no longer in military custody. See Sanford v. United States, 586 F.3d 28, 32 (D.C. Cir. 2009) (“[F]ederal courts have jurisdiction to review the validity of court-martial proceedings brought by non-custodial plaintiffs.”) (cleaned up); Schlesinger v. Councilman, 420 U.S. 738, 749–53 (1975) (reading the UCMJ and 28 U.S.C. § 1331 to permit non-habeas collateral attacks against court-martial judgments that are allegedly “void”).

Faced with a constitutional challenge to a military court’s sentence, we must assess whether the military courts properly exercised jurisdiction in Larrabee’s case. See Grisham v. Hagan, 361 U.S. 278, 279–80 (1960) (giving no deference to a court-martial’s finding that it had jurisdiction over the accused); Guagliardo, 361 U.S. at 282–84 (same); Singleton, 361 U.S. at 235–36 (same); Covert, 354 U.S. at 3–5 (same). “[W]hether the Constitution requires Article III courts to try [certain] offenses,” or whether they may be tried in a different forum, “is a structural question of subject matter jurisdiction” subject to “de novo review” in this court. Al Bahlul v. United States, 840 F.3d 757, 760 n.1 (D.C. Cir. 2016) (en banc) (Kavanaugh, J., concurring). Our jurisdiction cannot be circumscribed by the decisions of Article I courts, because the Constitution's structure of separated powers requires the Article III courts to exercise "judicial Power" independently of the other departments. U.S. CONST. art. III; cf. Marbury v. Madison, 5 U.S. (1 Cranch) 137, 180 (1803). We therefore proceed to consider whether the exercise of court-martial jurisdiction over Larrabee was constitutional.

III.

At the outset, we address the government's argument that this court must defer to Congress in determining whether Fleet Marine Reservists are properly subject to court-martial jurisdiction under the Make Rules Clause.³ Because "any expansion of court-martial jurisdiction ... necessarily encroaches on the jurisdiction of federal courts set up under Article III of the Constitution," Toth, 350 U.S. at 15, we cannot simply defer to Congress' decision to extend court-martial jurisdiction over Fleet Marine Reservists. Such extension is constitutional only if Fleet Marine Reservists "can be regarded as falling within the term 'land and naval Forces,'" Singleton, 361 U.S. at 241—a question that turns on "the military status of the accused," Solorio, 483 U.S. at 439.

When confronted with a UCMJ provision allowing court-martial jurisdiction over a class of persons, the Supreme Court has repeatedly declined to defer to Congress. See, e.g.,

Guagliardo, 361 U.S. at 283–87 (giving no deference to Congress’ determination that civilian military contractors may be court-martialed); Covert, 354 U.S. at 19–23 (same, for servicemembers’ dependents); Toth, 350 U.S. at 19–23 (same, for former servicemembers). Instead the Court has asked whether the accused was “actually [a] member[] or part of the armed forces,” or else was a “civilian[] ... entitled to have the benefit of safeguards afforded those tried in the regular courts authorized by Article III.” Toth, 350 U.S. at 15, 23. Although Congress maintains “plenary” authority under the Make Rules Clause to determine which offenses may be punished by court-martial, Solorio, 483 U.S. at 441, it does not possess the anterior authority to define which persons may be constitutionally court-martialed.

The government argues that this case is unique because Congress has not only authorized the court-martialing of Fleet Marine Reservists under the Make Rules Clause but has also defined the Fleet Marine Reserve as part of the “armed forces” pursuant to its authority under the Army and Navy Clauses. 10 U.S.C. §§ 101(a)(4), 8001(a)(2); U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cls. 12–13 (“Army and Navy Clauses”) (authorizing Congress to “raise and support Armies” and “provide and maintain a Navy”). Without question, Congress’ power to raise and support the nation’s fighting forces is capacious and entitled to substantial deference. See United States v. O’Brien, 391 U.S. 367, 377 (1968) (“The constitutional power of Congress to raise and support armies and to make all laws necessary and proper to that end is broad and sweeping.”). It follows, the government argues, that if Congress raises a military force pursuant to the Army and Navy Clauses, individuals in that force are ipso facto in “the land and naval Forces” covered by the Make Rules Clause.

The Supreme Court has recognized, however, that these Clauses are not coextensive, noting that “there might be circumstances where a person could be ‘in’ the armed services for purposes of [the Make Rules Clause] even though he had not formally been inducted into the military.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 23; see also Guagliardo, 361 U.S. at 284–85 (citing Ex parte Reed, 100 U.S. 13 (1879)). Because these Clauses are not perfectly overlapping, it is not necessarily the case that if a person is part of the forces Congress has raised under the Army and Navy Clauses, he may be court-martialed under the Make Rules Clause. The fact that Congress has chosen to define the Fleet Marine Reserve as part of the armed forces is therefore not sufficient to make its members constitutionally amenable to court-martial.

The Supreme Court has not deferred to Congress’ judgments in this area, but instead has assessed whether a person was actually in the armed forces, or instead was a civilian. In Guagliardo, the Court indicated that if Congress wanted to subject military contractors to court-martial jurisdiction, it could draft them into the armed forces. See 361 U.S. at 286. For Congress to invoke its power under the Army and Navy Clauses and label them part of the “land and naval Forces” would not have been enough. Similarly, in Toth, the Court held that Congress could not extend court-martial jurisdiction over a former serviceman who had been discharged from the army and returned to civilian life. See 350 U.S. at 22–23. Nothing in Toth or its successor cases suggests that if Congress had just defined the accused civilian as a member of the “land and naval Forces,” the Court would have reached a different result. Congress may not, through an act of legislative bootstrapping, expand the scope of the Make Rules Clause by defining (or redefining) its terms.

Contrary to the government’s assertions, Congress cannot rely on the Necessary and Proper Clause “to extend military jurisdiction to any group of persons beyond that class described” in the Make Rules Clause. Covert, 354 U.S. at 20–21; see also Toth, 350 U.S. at 22 (explaining that the Make Rules Clause does not “deprive people of trials under Bill of Rights safeguards, and we are not willing to hold that power to circumvent those safeguards should be inferred through the Necessary and Proper Clause”). As the Court has recognized, “a statute cannot be framed by which a civilian can lawfully be made amenable to the military jurisdiction in time of peace.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 35 (quoting WILLIAM WINTHROP, MILITARY LAW AND PRECEDENTS 107 (2d ed. 1920) (1886)) (cleaned up).

Congress’ authority under the Make Rules Clause is circumscribed by Article III and the Grand Jury Clause, which protect individual liberty interests. See id. at 21 (“Every extension of military jurisdiction is an encroachment on the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and, more important, acts as a deprivation of the right to jury trial and of other treasured constitutional protections.”). Because of the constitutional interests at stake, we do not defer to Congress’ judgments about the classes of persons who are within the “land and naval Forces,” and thus subject to court-martial jurisdiction.

IV.

Whether Larrabee was constitutionally subjected to court-martial jurisdiction turns “on one factor: the military status of the accused.” Solorio, 483 U.S. at 439. Neither the Supreme Court nor this court has spoken directly to the constitutional question of whether Fleet Marine Reservists specifically, or inactive-duty military retirees more generally, may be court-martialed. The Court’s decisions interpreting the Make Rules

Clause, however, draw a consistent distinction between civilians on the one hand and persons in the armed forces on the other. “[I]f the language of [the Make Rules Clause] is given its natural meaning, the power granted does not extend to civilians[.] ... The term ‘land and naval Forces’ refers to persons who are members of the armed services and not to [civilians].” Covert, 354 U.S. at 19–20 (cleaned up).

In each case in which the Court has found that the accused was in “the land and naval Forces,” he had a formal “relationship with the military and its institutions,” which made him “actually [a] member[] or part of the armed forces.” Toth, 350 U.S. at 14–15. Soldiers in active-duty service, most typically, may be subject to court-martial jurisdiction. Cf. Dynes v. Hoover, 61 U.S. (20 How.) 65, 79 (1857). Such active-duty personnel have been inducted into the military, are in the chain of command, and are required to obey their superiors’ orders. But the Court has also held that, in certain narrow circumstances, the Constitution permits the court-martialing of persons not presently in active-duty service—so long as they have a particular kind of “relationship with the military and its institutions.” Toth, 350 U.S. at 14.

The Court’s Make Rules Clause jurisprudence has been shaped in response to a diverse range of cases in which a person was court-martialed. What unites the decisions in these different contexts is that the persons found to be properly within “the land and naval Forces” had a formal relationship with the military that included an obligation to obey military orders.

In Reed, for instance, the Court held that a Navy paymaster’s clerk was amenable to court-martial. 100 U.S. at 22. The clerk had never been formally inducted into the Navy and so was not an active-duty servicemember. Nevertheless, the clerk had agreed to serve on a naval vessel, binding “himself to be subject to the laws and regulations for the government of the navy and the discipline of the vessel,” and had “take[n] an oath ... to serve until discharged.” Id. at 19–20, 22 (cleaned up). The clerk’s formal relationship with the Navy was further confirmed by the fact that he was appointed by the commander of the ship and could only be discharged in the same way. He wore a uniform, had a fixed rank, and was on the Navy’s payroll. Id. at 22. Finally, at the time of his court-martialing, the clerk had not been discharged and so had an ongoing obligation to obey the orders of the vessel’s commander. Id. at 20. In light of these observations, the Court concluded, “[i]f these officers are not in the naval service, it may well be asked who are.” Id. at 22.

Similarly, in Kahn v. Anderson, the Court held that a group of soldiers who had been court-martialed and sentenced to a term of imprisonment remained amenable to court-martial for crimes committed while in military custody. See 255 U.S. 1, 7–8 (1921). The prisoners had argued that, as a result of their initial conviction, they had “ceased to be soldiers and were no longer subject to military law.” Id. at 7. Rejecting that argument as “unsubstantial,” the Court held that “even if their discharge as soldiers had resulted from the previous sentences ... it would be here immaterial, since, as they remained military prisoners, they were for that reason subject to military law and trial by court-martial for offenses committed during such imprisonment.” Id. at 7–8 (citing Carter v. McClaghry, 183 U.S. 365, 383 (1902)). The prisoners had a legal relationship with the armed forces, even if involuntary, because they were “military prisoners undergoing punishment for previous sentences.” Id. at 7. As the Court explained in Carter, because military jurisdiction “attache[s]” at the time of a soldier’s court-martialing, he remains under the military’s jurisdiction until his release. 183 U.S. at 383. “Having [been] sentenced, his status [is] that of a military prisoner” who must obey military orders. Id. Therefore, “for offences committed during his confinement he [is] liable to trial and punishment by court martial.” Id.

Congress also may authorize courts-martial to punish those who disobey lawful draft orders. See Billings v. Truesdell, 321 U.S. 542, 556 (1944) (“We have no doubt of the power of Congress to enlist the manpower of the nation for prosecution of the war and to subject to military jurisdiction those who are unwilling, as well as those who are eager, to come to the defense of their nation in its hour of peril.”).⁴ From the moment he is called to serve, a draftee becomes part of “the land and naval Forces”—bound to the military by a legal duty to serve, even if involuntarily. Cf. Houston v. Moore, 18 U.S. (5 Wheat.) 1, 20 (1820) (“[I]f Congress had pleased so to declare, a militia man, called into the service of the United States, might have been held and considered as being constructively in that service, though not actually so.”); Martin v. Mott, 25 U.S. (12 Wheat.) 19, 33–34 (1827) (permitting the court-martialing of a man who was ordered into militia service, but refused to join). Even if he refuses to be inducted, a draftee is a member of the armed forces and obliged to obey military orders. Billings, 321 U.S. at 556.

The clerk in Reed, the prisoner in Kahn, and the draftee in Billings each had a legal relationship to the military that included an ongoing duty to obey military orders. For that reason, they came within the scope of “the land and naval Forces.”

⁴ Billings ultimately held that the courts-martial lacked jurisdiction for statutory, not constitutional, reasons. See 321 U.S. at 556–58.

By contrast, in every case in which the Court has struck down the exercise of court-martial jurisdiction over a class of persons, the accused had no formal relationship with the military and no ongoing obligation to obey military orders. In Toth, for example, the Court made clear that servicemembers who have been legally discharged and returned to civilian life are not part of “the land and naval Forces.” See 350 U.S. at 22–23. Although Toth was accused of committing a crime while a servicemember, at the time of his arrest he had been discharged and “had no relationship of any kind with the military.” Id. at 13. Whatever his prior relation to the military, the Make Rules Clause did not permit a discharged soldier to be court-martialed. “For given its natural meaning, the power granted Congress ‘To make Rules’ to regulate ‘the land and naval Forces’ would seem to restrict court-martial jurisdiction to persons who are actually members or part of the armed forces”—that is, persons who are in the armed forces at the time of their court-martialing. Id. at 15. The Court explained that the purpose of the military justice system would not be impaired by “giving ex-servicemen the benefit of a civilian court trial when they are actually civilians.” Id. at 22.

In a pair of successor cases, the Court extended Toth’s basic logic to hold that servicemembers’ civilian dependents may not be court-martialed. “The term ‘land and naval Forces’ refers to persons who are members of the armed services and not to their civilian wives, children and other dependents.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 19–20; see also Singleton, 361 U.S. at 248. As the Court explained, the servicemembers’ dependents “had never been members of the army, had never been employed by the army, [and] had never served in the army in any capacity.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 32. Although they often live with servicemembers on military installations and receive military benefits, they “do not lose their civilian status and their right to a civilian trial” by virtue of those facts. Id. at 23.

Similarly, the Court has held that private military contractors may not be court-martialed. Like discharged soldiers and servicemembers' dependents, the Constitution "requires [the military's] civilian employees to be afforded the same right of trial by jury." Grisham, 361 U.S. at 280. In Guagliardo, the Court noted that private contractors could be court-martialed if they had voluntarily bound themselves to the military through procedures like those used by the paymaster's clerk in Reed, or if they had been "incorporate[d] ... directly into the armed services, either by compulsory induction or by voluntary enlistment." 361 U.S. at 286. But unless such action were taken to bring them into a "military status," private contractors remained "civilians" outside the scope of the Make Rules Clause. Id. at 287, 284.

The Court has declined to adopt a bright-line test to distinguish between civilians and those within the "land and naval Forces." See Covert, 354 U.S. at 22 ("Even if it were possible, we need not attempt here to precisely define the boundary between 'civilians' and members of the 'land and naval Forces.'"). Nonetheless, its decisions construing the scope of the Make Rules Clause, read together, suggest that a person is part of the "land and naval Forces" and may be subject to court-martial jurisdiction if he has a formal relationship with the armed forces that includes a duty to obey military orders.⁵

⁵ A legal relationship to the military that includes an obligation to obey military orders is sufficient for membership in "the land and naval Forces." Therefore, we need not decide whether such a relationship is necessary for membership in "the land and naval Forces."

The rule suggested by the Court’s caselaw is consistent with our understanding of the original meaning of the Make Rules Clause. The American “court-martial is in fact older than the Constitution.” Ortiz v. United States, 138 S. Ct. 2165, 2175 (2018) (cleaned up). The Court has therefore often “undertaken . . . the difficult task of interpreting [the Make Rules Clause] by drawing upon English constitutional history.” Loving v. United States, 517 U.S. 748, 760 (1996). The organization and regulation of the eighteenth-century British military, as well as an American court-martial proceeding at the end of the Revolutionary War, suggest that at the Founding, the term “land and naval Forces” was understood to encompass inactive-duty personnel who remained obligated to obey military orders, including orders to serve again if called. Such inactive-duty soldiers, in other words, were regarded as having “military status.”

We begin with the pre-Revolutionary example of “half-pay officers.” In the seventeenth century, in recognition of prior service, the British government began paying certain officers a reduced salary in peacetime. See JOHN CHILDS, THE BRITISH ARMY OF WILLIAM III, 1689–1702, at 70 (1987). Half-pay officers were allowed to live otherwise ordinary civilian lives but had to return to active-duty service if ordered. See N.A.M. Rodger, Commissioned Officers’ Careers in the Royal Navy, 1690–1815, 3 J. FOR MAR. RSCH. 85, 90–91 (2001). After 1714, all British officers became eligible to participate in this system, which fed the rise of a burgeoning corps of officers who made lifelong careers in the military. “By mid-century long service had become the norm,” and the half-pay system was a recognizable feature of British military culture. JOHN BREWER, THE SINEWS OF POWER 56 (1989).

When compared to active-duty soldiers, half-pay officers' connections to Britain's armed forces were quite sparse. Aside from their diminished pay, their only connection to the military was their ongoing service obligation.⁶ Nevertheless, throughout the eighteenth-century, Parliament consistently described these half-pay officers as part of "his Majesty's land forces and marines." 9 Geo. 2 ch. 34, § 21; see also THE ANNALS OF KING GEORGE, YEAR THE THIRD 153 (1718) (describing funds appropriated for "Half-pay to the Officers of the Land Forces and Marines disbanded" after the Jacobite uprising of 1715). In 1758, Edmund Burke's Annual Register reported that Parliament had set aside funds for the "widows of such reduced officers of the land forces and marines, as died upon the establishment of half-pay." 1 ANNUAL REGISTER 128 (Edmund Burke ed., 4th ed. 1764) (1758). Decades later, the House of Commons directed one of its committees to estimate the cost of "Half Pay and Allowances [for] the Reduced Officers of His Majesty's [North] American Forces" for the coming year. 50 JOURNAL OF THE HOUSE OF COMMONS [1794–95], at 84 (c. 1795).

Although British half-pay officers were recognized as having military status, across the eighteenth century there was considerable debate about whether these officers should be subjected to the jurisdiction of peacetime courts-martial. Some half-pay officers were court-martialed in the early 1700s under the Mutiny Act adopted in 1689. See 1 JOHN MCARTHUR, PRINCIPLES AND PRACTICE OF NAVAL AND MILITARY COURTS MARTIAL 190 (1805) ("[O]fficers on half pay were originally deemed, though not in actual service, to be subject to martial law.”); cf. Loving, 517 U.S. at 761–65 (discussing the Mutiny Act’s history). After realizing that the Act’s terms furnished uncertain legal grounds for those proceedings, Parliament amended the Act in 1748 to make clear that half-pay officers were subject to court-martial jurisdiction.⁷ 22 Geo. 2 c. 5; see 1 MCARTHUR at 189–92; HARRIS PRENDERGAST, THE LAW RELATING TO OFFICERS IN THE ARMY 25 (1855).

⁶ While all half-pay officers were in principle subject to recall, "[o]fficers were retained on the list who were known to be incapable and even insane because no other support for their old age was available." Rodger, 3 J. FOR MAR. RSCH. at 91. For such officers, the half-pay system was a de facto retirement.

Soon thereafter, public opposition forced Parliament to reverse course, and the Act’s jurisdiction-extending provision was repealed. In 1785 the Court of Exchequer Chamber weighed in, finding that half-pay officers did not come within the scope of the Mutiny Act’s original terms. See 1 MCARTHUR at 195–96; PRENDERGAST at 25; JOHN DELAFONS, A TREATISE ON NAVAL COURTS MARTIAL 62–63 (1805). But that judicial decision did not limit the legislature’s authority to subject half-pay officers to military jurisdiction: one year later, Parliament again amended the Mutiny Act to encompass half-pay officers with brevet rank. See 1 MCARTHUR at 201. Thus, although it was contested throughout the eighteenth century whether half-pay officers should be legislatively subject to court-martial

⁷ The amendment provided:

And whereas it may be otherwise doubted, whether ... the reduced Officers of His Majesty’s Land Forces and Marines on the British and Irish Establishment of Half Pay, be within the Intent and Meaning of this Act, ... it is hereby enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That the ... reduced Officers of His Majesty’s Land Forces and Marines, on the British and Irish Establishments of Half Pay, be at all Times subject to all the Penalties and Punishments mentioned in this Act.

22 Geo. 2 c. 5.

jurisdiction, it was beyond controversy that they were part of Britain's armed "forces" amenable to military jurisdiction.⁸

The Americans who ratified the Constitution were familiar with the structure of the British military generally, and with the half-pay system specifically. Indeed, some of the Continental Army's most prominent leaders had been half-pay officers in the years before independence—Charles Lee of Virginia, for instance. See 1 PAPERS OF GEORGE WASHINGTON, REVOLUTIONARY WAR SERIES 18 n.4 (Philander D. Chase ed., 1985). During the Revolutionary War, the Continental Congress pledged on more than one occasion that after hostilities ceased, retired American officers would be given half pay, just like their British counterparts.⁹ See 11 JOURNALS

⁹ Because of the federal government's financial difficulties after the Revolutionary War, those plans did not ultimately materialize. The

OF THE CONTINENTAL CONGRESS, 1774–1789, at 502–03 (Worthington Chauncey Ford ed., 1908) [hereinafter JOURNALS]; 18 id. at 960–61. In 1781, Congress directed the Continental Army to place certain redundant officers in half-pay status and to make them amenable to involuntary recall. See 21 id. at 1180. The idea that an inactive-duty soldier might be part of the Continental Army’s “forces” was therefore not foreign to Founding-era Americans.

Indeed, a notable historical episode confirms that in the early American Republic inactive-duty troops were understood to be part of “the land and naval Forces.”¹⁰ The Continental Congress was authorized to “mak[e] rules for the government of the said land and naval forces.” ARTICLES OF CONFEDERATION of 1781, art. IX, para. 4. To be court-martialed under the laws adopted by the Continental Congress, therefore, a person had to belong to the “land and naval forces.” Towards the end of the Revolutionary War, Congress elected to furlough indefinitely most soldiers in the Continental Army, with the understanding that they would be fully discharged after a peace with Britain was concluded. See 24 JOURNALS at 269–71, 364–65, 390. Pursuant to that directive, in 1783 George Washington instructed his officers to furlough their troops—to issue what were, in effect, conditional discharge

United States’ military retirement system dates from the mid-nineteenth century, and Congress has subjected military retirees to court-martial jurisdiction since that time. See J. Mackey Ives & Michael J. Davidson, Court-Martial Jurisdiction over Retirees under Articles 2(4) and 2(6): Time to Lighten Up and Tighten Up?, 175 MIL. L. REV. 1, 3–5, 11–12 (2003).

papers.¹¹ Between their furlough in June and their eventual discharge in October, these troops were not in active-duty service and were allowed to return indefinitely to civilian life. See Alexander W. Armour, Revolutionary War Discharges, 21 WILLIAM & MARY Q. 344, 353–57 (1941); 25 JOURNALS at 702–03.

We know that these inactive-duty soldiers were part of the “land and naval forces” because, while they were furloughed, some were court-martialed. See Mary A.Y. Gallagher, Reinterpreting the “Very Trifling Mutiny” at Philadelphia in June 1783, 119 PENN. MAG. OF HIST. & BIOG. 3, 28 (1995). In June 1783, a large contingent of them—angry they had not been paid their full wages—staged a violent protest in Philadelphia, forcing the Continental Congress to evacuate the city. From Princeton, Congress directed the Army’s leadership to take “immediate measures . . . to confine and bring to trial all such persons belonging to the army as have been principally active in the late mutiny.” 24 JOURNALS at 412–13. After restoring order, some of them were court-martialed for mutiny.¹² See 25 JOURNALS at 565–66.

Later, the Continental Congress intervened to pardon the convicted soldiers. Id. While Congress knew that many of these soldiers had received furloughs before the mutiny, it never challenged the court-martial’s power to try them; indeed, it had ordered their trial. Henry Knox, the Secretary of War, voiced no objection to the proceedings. See Begani, 81 M.J. at 285 n.2 (Maggs, J., concurring) (citing 33 JOURNALS at 666–67). And in his later narration of the episode, John Marshall never questioned the military tribunal’s jurisdiction. See 4 JOHN MARSHALL, THE LIFE OF GEORGE WASHINGTON 614–18 (1805). Although these furloughed soldiers were not currently in active duty, and would likely never serve again, Founding-era observers evidently had no difficulty conceiving of them as part of the “land and naval forces” whose members could be court-martialed.

Armour, Revolutionary War Discharges, 21 WILLIAM & MARY Q. 344, 354–55 (1941).

¹² Under the Articles of War then in effect, only a “soldier or officer” could be tried for mutiny. Articles of War of 1776, § 2, art. 3, reprinted in 5 JOURNALS at 789.

* * *

The scope of court-martial jurisdiction under the Articles of Confederation incorporated the settled meaning of “land and naval forces” that the revolutionaries inherited from their experience as British subjects. Cf. Felix Frankfurter, Some Reflections on the Reading of Statutes, 47 COLUM. L. REV. 527, 537 (1947) (“[I]f a word is obviously transplanted from another legal source ... it brings the old soil with it.”). In drafting the Constitution, “the Framers recognized and sanctioned existing military jurisdiction by exempting from the Fifth Amendment’s Grand Jury Clause all ‘cases arising in the land or naval forces’” and “by granting [Congress] power ‘to make Rules for the Government and Regulation of the land and naval Forces.’” Ortiz, 138 S. Ct. at 2175 (cleaned up). In other words, those persons who were in the “land and naval forces” under the Articles and who could therefore be court-martialed remained so under the Constitution.

In eighteenth-century Britain and the post-revolutionary United States, “the land and naval forces” comprehended not only active-duty soldiers, but inactive-duty ones as well. Half-pay officers were part of “his Majesty’s land forces and marines” because they had a relationship with the military that entailed an obligation to serve again, if called. The furloughed soldiers court-martialed in Philadelphia were part of the American “land and naval forces,” and for the same reason. These historical examples confirm that a person who has a formal relationship with the military that includes an obligation to obey military orders is part of the “land and naval Forces,” as that phrase was understood at the Founding. Because such persons are “actually members or part of the armed forces,” the Make Rules Clause permits Congress to subject them to court-martial jurisdiction. Toth, 350 U.S. at 15.

VI.

Based on the foregoing, it is sufficient for a person to fall within the “land and naval Forces” if he has a formal relationship with the armed forces that includes a duty to obey military orders. Applying that test of military status here, we conclude that members of the Fleet Marine Reserve are a part of the “land and naval Forces” and therefore that Larrabee’s court-martial was constitutional.

A.

Larrabee voluntarily joined the Marine Corps in 1994. As an active-duty Marine, he was unquestionably in the armed forces and amenable to court-martial jurisdiction. After serving in active duty for twenty years and attaining the rank of Staff Sergeant, he elected to transfer to the Fleet Marine Reserve. In practice he became a retiree, but he maintained a legal relationship with the armed forces. As a Fleet Marine Reservist, he assumed an obligation to obey, “without his consent,” an order to reenter active-duty service during a “war or national emergency declared by Congress,” a “national emergency declared by the President,” or as “otherwise authorized by law.” 10 U.S.C. § 8385(a); see also id. § 688(a)–

(b). These service obligations are central to the identity of the Fleet Marine Reserve, whose basic “purpose ... is to maintain a ready manpower pool of trained Marines for recall and mobilization.” MCO 1900.16 ¶ 7001.2. In addition to this duty to reenter active service, if ordered, Larrabee was also “required” to report to “active duty for training” for up to two months in any four-year period. 10 U.S.C. § 8385(b). Finally, he was subject to employment restrictions, as well as military reporting requirements.¹³

Through his membership in the Fleet Marine Reserve, Larrabee had legally bound himself to the armed forces and assumed a duty to obey military orders. He therefore had a “military status” and was properly subject to court-martial jurisdiction. Solorio, 483 U.S. at 439; see also Guagliardo, 361 U.S. at 287 (private military contractor lacked “military status” and so could not be court-martialed); MCO 1900.16 ¶ 1002.20 (discharged soldiers, who may not be court-martialed under Toth, lack “all military status”).

B.

This conclusion is consistent with the settled position of the CAAF, which has long recognized military retirees as amenable to court-martial. See Pearson v. Bloss, 28 M.J. 376, 379 (C.M.A. 1989) (upholding military jurisdiction over retired personnel in the Air Force); United States v. Overton, ¹³ Our dissenting colleague maintains that until members of the Fleet Marine Reserve are recalled to active duty, “their day-to-day lives are equivalent to those of ordinary civilians.” Dissenting Op. 3. As a practical matter, this is undoubtedly true. As a formal legal matter, however, they continue to retain “military status,” even if not all the responsibilities of active-duty servicemembers. In times of emergency and war, Fleet Marine Reservists must answer the call to serve, whereas civilians may choose to stay home.

24 M.J. 309, 311 (C.M.A. 1987) (same, for members of the Fleet Marine Reserve). It reaffirmed that view last year in United States v. Begani, holding that “retired members of the armed forces”—including “members of the ... Fleet Marine Reserve”—are “part of the ‘land and naval Forces’” whose members may be constitutionally court-martialed. 81 M.J. at 276, 279, cert. denied, 142 S. Ct. 711 (2021). In particular, the CAAF’s decision rested on the fact that Begani, a naval Fleet Reservist, (1) “receive[d] ongoing retainer pay” because he was a “current member[] of the armed forces, though not on active duty,” and (2) was “require[d] [to] maintain readiness for future recall.” Id. at 278 (emphasis removed). We note also that the only Article III court of appeals to have considered whether military retirees may be court-martialed reached the same result. See United States ex rel. Pasela v. Fenno, 167 F.2d 593, 595 (2d Cir. 1948) (holding that a naval Fleet Reservist could be court-martialed and pointing to the fact that he “remain[ed] subject to call to active duty”); cf. Hooper v. United States, 326 F.2d 982, 986–87 (Ct. Cl. 1964) (similar).

C.

Our conclusion that Fleet Marine Reservists are in “the land and naval Forces” is further reinforced by the fact that, in other contexts not raising the constitutional question presented here, the Supreme Court has recognized military retirees as part of the nation’s armed forces. Barker v. Kansas, for instance, concerned whether military retirees’ benefits should be taxed as a pension for past service or as “current pay for current services.” 503 U.S. 594, 600 (1992). In resolving that dispute, the Court explicitly confirmed that “[m]ilitary retirees unquestionably remain in the service and are subject to restrictions and recall.” Id. at 599. In the similar case of McCarty v. McCarty, the Court noted that “[t]he retired officer remains a member of the Army, ... continues to be subject to the Uniform Code of Military Justice, ... may forfeit all or part of his retired pay if he engages in certain activities,” and “remains subject to recall to active duty by the Secretary of the Army at any time.” 453 U.S. 210, 221–22 (1981) (cleaned up). In Kahn the Court flatly rejected the argument that, because “retired officers” are not in the armed forces, they may not sit on court-martial panels: “it is not open to question ... that such officers are officers in the military service of the United States.” 255 U.S. at 6–7.

Indeed, as early as 1881, in United States v. Tyler, the Court found that while retirees are “not required to perform full service, they are [still] part of the army, and may be assigned to such duty as the laws and regulations permit.” 105 U.S. 244, 245 (1881); cf. Thornley v. United States, 113 U.S. 310, 315 (1885) (“The point on which [Tyler] turned was ... that an officer of the army, though retired, was still in the service.”). Finally, the Supreme Court and this court’s predecessor have both affirmed court-martial sentences imposed on military retirees without questioning the constitutionality of the military proceedings. See United States v. Fletcher, 148 U.S. 84 (1893); United States v. Page, 137 U.S. 673 (1891); Closson v. United States ex rel. Armes, 7 App. D.C. 460 (1896).

As already noted, the Court has not squarely addressed whether military retirees, such as members of the Fleet Marine Reserve, may be court-martialed consistent with the Constitution. Nevertheless, the Court’s consistent and repeated acknowledgement that military retirees are properly regarded as members of the armed forces, rather than civilians, substantiates our conclusion that Fleet Marine Reservists fall within the “land and naval Forces” governed by the Make Rules Clause.

Because he maintained a relationship with the armed forces and was obligated to obey military orders at the time of his court-martialing, Larrabee was in “the land and naval Forces” and constitutionally subject to court-martial jurisdiction.

VII.

Larrabee offers five reasons why Fleet Marine Reservists may not constitutionally be court-martialed. None are availing.

First, pointing to Singleton, Larrabee argues that we must apply a flexible, functional test to determine whether members of the Fleet Marine Reserve “can be regarded as falling within the term ‘land and naval Forces.’” 361 U.S. at 241. The salient constitutional question, in his view, is whether the person tried at court-martial “has any authority or obligation to act in a military capacity.” This inquiry requires a case-by-case analysis of whether the accused possesses the “substantive authorities or responsibilities ... relevant to the preservation of good order and discipline among troops in active service.” Larrabee would have us consider factors such as: Can the accused wear a uniform? Can he give orders? Must he obey orders? Must he meet the military’s physical fitness requirements? When all these factors are taken together, Larrabee argues, Fleet Marine Reservists resemble civilians far more than soldiers. A stand-alone duty to return to service, he insists, is not enough to satisfy this functional test.

When determining the scope of “the land and naval Forces,” the Supreme Court has never resorted to the kind of complex multifactor test that Larrabee proposes. In the 1960s the Court adopted a balancing test, akin to Larrabee’s, for determining which offenses could be prosecuted at court-martial. Under O’Callahan v. Parker, 395 U.S. 258 (1969), courts were required to weigh a “myriad of factors ... in determining whether an offense is service connected,” including the nature of the offense, the status of the victim, and the location of the crime. Solorio, 483 U.S. at 448. The Court has since squarely rejected that approach, holding that the permissible scope of court-martial jurisdiction turns “on one factor: the military status of the accused.” Id. at 439 (emphasis added). To determine the status of a person tried at court-martial, the Court has consistently analyzed whether he has a legal relation to the military that entails an obligation to obey military orders—or whether, by contrast, he is a “civilian[] ... entitled to [the] safeguards afforded ... by Article III of the Constitution.” Toth, 350 U.S. at 23. We therefore reject Larrabee’s multifactor balancing test for differentiating civilians from military personnel.

Second, relying on the district court’s analysis below, Larrabee argues that even if Fleet Marine Reservists are in the armed forces, that is not sufficient to permit their court-martialing under the Make Rules Clause. Subjecting them to the military courts’ jurisdiction, the district court held, must also be “necessary to maintain good order and discipline” in the ranks. Larrabee, 502 F. Supp. 3d at 331 (citing Toth, 350 U.S. at 22). Because members of the Fleet Marine Reserve are unlikely to be recalled, the exercise of court-martial jurisdiction over them is not necessary and so is unconstitutional.

That objection misses the mark. In Toth, the Court did not hold that persons in the armed forces may be court-martialed only in cases of military necessity. Rather, it held that that an ex-serviceman who is now a civilian may not be court-martialed for crimes committed while in military service. In reaching that conclusion, the Court rejected the suggestion that the Necessary and Proper Clause could stretch the Make Rules Clause to cover civilians who did not fall within the letter of “the land and naval Forces.” See Toth, 350 U.S. at 21–22; see also Covert, 354 U.S. at 20–21. And it noted in passing that “[f]ree countries of the world have tried to restrict military tribunals to the narrowest jurisdiction deemed absolutely essential to maintaining discipline among troops in active service.” Toth, 350 U.S. at 22. But this general statement appeared in the context of the Court’s sharp distinction between civilians and servicemembers. The Toth Court drew a line between civilians receiving the full protections of Article III and persons within the armed services subject to military trial. Contrary to Larrabee’s claims, the Court did not impose limits on court-martial jurisdiction over those persons who had a “military status” and were actually within “the land and naval Forces.”

Third, Larrabee and amici protest that members of the Fleet Marine Reserve are subject to only one duty—namely, a duty to return to active-duty service, if called—and that such a self-standing duty is not enough, because a person may be court-martialed only if he is legally obligated to obey more than one military order. We fail to see why a servicemember who must obey one order is less a part of “the land and naval Forces” than his peer who must obey two.¹⁴ Cf. id. at 17 (“[I]t is the primary business of armies and navies to fight or be ready to fight wars should the occasion arise.”) (emphasis added). In any event, Larrabee’s repeated assertion that Fleet Marine

Reservists have only “one duty” fails to account for their multiple military obligations, which include a duty to return to service, if called, a duty to report to active duty for training in peacetime, and a duty to comply with the military’s employment and reporting regulations.

Fourth, Larrabee contends that if members of the Fleet Marine Reserve fall within the scope of the Make Rules Clause, then if Congress reauthorized a compulsory draft, every person presently registered with the Selective Service would become subject to court-martial—before they had ever been inducted into the military, donned a uniform, or received an order.¹⁵ Consistent with its authority under the Army and Navy Clauses, Congress may require men on the Selective Service list to serve in the military. See Arver v. United States, 245 U.S. 366, 377 (1918). Yet, while those who have been drafted may be constitutionally court-martialed, the Court has never implied that those yet to be drafted may also face military justice. Before a Selective Service registrant has been ordered to serve, he has no military status—no current “relationship with the military and its institutions,” only a prospective one. Toth, 350 U.S. at 14; cf. Billings, 321 U.S. at 546 (affirming, in dicta, the constitutionality of a statute that authorized military jurisdiction over persons “lawfully called, drafted, or ordered into [the armed forces] from the dates they are required by the terms of the call, draft or order to obey the same”) (emphasis added) (quoting Articles of War of 1920, Pub. L. No. 66-242, art. 2(a), 41 Stat. 787, 787). Only after being ordered into service does a draftee become part of “the land and naval Forces” whose members may be court-martialed. See id. at 556. Before being a drafted, by contrast, he has no ongoing relationship with the military that obliges him to obey military orders. Larrabee's reductio ad absurdum therefore fails to show that Fleet Marine Reservists must fall outside of the Make Rules Clause.

Finally, Larrabee argues that as a matter of policy, "there is simply no good argument for why ... military retirees need to be subject to the UCMJ while they are retired." Larrabee and his amici point out that courts-martial lack many of the constitutional protections afforded in Article III courts, and that the UCMJ's procedural safeguards are grants of legislative grace and not guaranteed as a matter of constitutional right. These features, however, are part of the established operation of military justice under our Constitution. Cf. Parker v. Levy, 417 U.S. 733, 744 (1974) ("[T]he military constitutes a specialized community governed by a separate discipline from that of the civilian, and ... the rights of men in the armed forces must perforce be conditioned to meet certain overriding demands of discipline and duty.") (cleaned up).

Our dissenting colleague emphasizes the centrality of the right to a trial by jury under our Constitution, Dissenting Op. 1–2, and we of course recognize the importance of the jury system in the Article III courts. Nevertheless, it is not this court that has extended court-martial jurisdiction, but Congress. Although the judiciary must determine whether military retirees like Larrabee actually have "military status," the question of whether subjecting them to court-martial jurisdiction is wise or foolish is for the political branches to decide.¹⁶

¹⁶ As the Supreme Court has emphasized, "Congress has the primary responsibility for the delicate task of balancing the rights of servicemen against the needs of the military." Solorio, 483 U.S. at

VIII.

Larrabee argues in the alternative that the Grand Jury Clause separately barred his court-martial. He maintains that an inactive-duty servicemember may not be tried by a military tribunal for an offense that is unrelated to military order and discipline, because such a “case[]” does not “aris[e] in the land or naval forces.” U.S. CONST. amend. V. In his view, the government therefore violated the Grand Jury Clause by court-martialing him for the sexual assault of a civilian while he was an inactive-duty Fleet Marine Reservist. We disagree.

The Supreme Court has already rejected this argument. In Solorio, it categorically renounced the service-connection test set out in O’Callahan, making clear that “the Constitution ... condition[s] the proper exercise of court-martial jurisdiction over an offense on one factor: the military status of the accused.” 483 U.S. at 439. Larrabee argues that Solorio did not eliminate O’Callahan’s service-connection test requirement for inactive-duty servicemembers, and that the Grand Jury Clause requires one. But Solorio’s holding was not limited to active-duty troops. Rather the Court held that, as a general matter, “determinations concerning the scope of court-martial jurisdiction over offenses committed by servicemen [are]

447. The Executive Branch also must balance these concerns in the exercise of its prosecutorial discretion. The Army, for instance, has historically adhered to a “policy that retired personnel subject to the [UCMJ] will not be tried for any offenses by any military tribunal unless extraordinary circumstances are present linking them to the military establishment or involving them in conduct inimical to the welfare of the nation.” 7 JUDGE ADVOCS. GEN., DIGEST OF OPINIONS [1957–58] 108 (1958).

reserved for Congress” and are not to be second-guessed by courts.¹⁷ Id. at 440.

Moreover, as the Court explained in Covert, the Fifth Amendment’s “exception ... for ‘cases arising in the land or naval forces’ was undoubtedly designed to correlate with the power granted Congress to provide for the ‘Government and Regulation’ of the armed services.” 354 U.S. at 22. In other words, the Grand Jury Clause does not limit Congress’ powers under the Make Rules Clause. Cf. Ex parte Milligan, 71 U.S. 2, 138 (1866) (Chase, C.J., concurring) (observing that the Grand Jury Clause’s “exception [has] the same import and effect as if the powers of Congress in relation to the government of the army and navy and the militia had been ¹⁷ We note that even if some type of service connection were required when the government seeks to court-martial an inactive-duty servicemember, Larrabee was still properly subject to court-martial jurisdiction. While his offenses were civilian in nature and committed against a civilian on private property, they were undoubtedly service-connected under O’Callahan. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine how the sexual assault of a forward-deployed, active-duty Marine’s wife by a retired Marine could not impair military order and discipline. In fact, in this case it did: after Larrabee’s assault came to light, his victim’s husband was reassigned from Japan to the United States.

The facts in Solorio were very similar. There, a coastguardsman was accused of sexually abusing the minor children of his fellow coastguardsmen on private property. Before the case reached the Supreme Court, the Court of Military Appeals (the CAAF’s precursor) upheld the conviction under O’Callahan’s service-connection test, reasoning that the sexual abuse of servicemembers’ civilian dependents has “a continuing effect on the victims and their families and ultimately on the morale of any military unit or organization to which the family member is assigned.” United States v. Solorio, 21 M.J. 251, 256 (C.M.A. 1986); see also Solorio, 483 U.S. at 451 (Stevens, J., concurring in the judgment). So too here.

recited in the [Fifth] [A]mendment, and cases within those powers had been expressly excepted from its operation”). Congress’ authority to govern and regulate persons in the armed forces is “plenary,” and Larrabee offers no compelling reason why the Grand Jury Clause constrains that authority in the case of inactive-duty troops. Solorio, 483 U.S. at 441.

As the text and structure of the two clauses confirm, the scope of the Grand Jury Clause’s exception is coextensive with that of the Make Rules Clause. Because Larrabee was in “the land and naval Forces” at the time of his court-martialing, U.S. CONST. art. I, § 8, cl. 14, his “case[] ar[]ose] in the land or naval forces,” U.S. CONST. amend. V.

Military trials are constitutional only for those who have a military status. Because the exercise of court-martial jurisdiction limits the constitutional protections of Article III courts, we must independently determine whether a person is in “the land and naval Forces” or is a civilian. The Supreme Court’s precedents interpreting the Make Rules Clause, as well as historical evidence from the Founding era, both indicate that Congress may extend court-martial jurisdiction over a person if he has a formal relationship with the military that includes a duty to obey military orders. Larrabee had the requisite military status because at the time of his arrest he was a member of the Fleet Marine Reserve and was subject to ongoing military duties. The judgment of the district court is therefore Reversed.

TATEL, Circuit Judge, concurring in part and dissenting in part: I agree with my colleagues about everything except what matters most: their conclusion. I agree that whether individuals are subject to court-martial jurisdiction turns on their military status and that the unifying pattern in Supreme Court precedent “is that the persons found to be properly within ‘the land and naval Forces’ had a formal relationship with the military that included an obligation to obey military orders.” Majority Op. at 13. I also agree with Judge Rao that we owe Congress no deference in interpreting the scope of the Make Rules Clause. That said, I disagree that the type of order to which Larrabee is potentially subject—a recall order summoning him from civilian life to take up arms—is like any other military order. By treating it as such, the court extends court-martial jurisdiction not only to the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, but also to roughly two million military retirees. Because this dramatic expansion of court-martial jurisdiction is beyond what the Constitution allows and case law supports, I respectfully dissent from that portion of the court’s opinion.

The court is of course correct that this case is about the Make Rules Clause. But we must interpret that clause in the context of the rest of the Constitution, which puts a heavy thumb on the scale against extending court-martial jurisdiction. The Constitution guarantees the right to juries not once, not twice, but four times.

Article III: “The Trial of all Crimes, except in Cases of Impeachment, shall be by Jury.”

Fifth Amendment: “No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a Grand Jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the Militia, when in actual service in time of War or public danger.”

Sixth Amendment: “In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury.”

Seventh Amendment: “In Suits at common law . . . the right of trial by jury shall be preserved.”

(Emphases added.)

By contrast, the Constitution has nothing at all to say about court-martial jurisdiction. The Supreme Court inferred this “very limited and extraordinary jurisdiction . . . from the cryptic language in” the Make Rules Clause. Reid v. Covert, 354 U.S. 1, 21 (1957) (plurality opinion). Its justification for allowing courts-martial is straightforward. As it explained in United States ex rel. Toth v. Quarles, “[c]ourt-martial jurisdiction sprang from the belief that within the military ranks there is need for a prompt, ready-at-hand means of compelling obedience and order.” 350 U.S. 11, 22 (1955). In Toth, the Court held that a discharged soldier could not be court-martialed because “[i]t is impossible to think that the discipline of the Army is going to be disrupted, its morale impaired, or its orderly processes disturbed, by giving ex-servicemen the benefit of a civilian court trial when they are actually civilians.” Id. Two years later, in Reid v. Covert, the court extended Toth to military dependents who commit crimes on military bases, holding that they too cannot be court-martialed because such conduct bears even less on “the maintenance of order and discipline in the armed forces than the conduct of” discharged soldiers. 354 U.S. at 32; see also Kinsella v. United States ex rel. Singleton, 361 U.S. 234, 248–49 (1960) (extending Covert’s reasoning to noncapital offenses committed by military dependents).

Surveying Supreme Court precedent, my colleagues point out that only individuals with “a formal relationship with the military that include[s] an obligation to obey military orders” are “properly within ‘the land and naval Forces.’” Majority Op. at 13. This makes sense given that the need for military order and discipline is what justifies subjecting military personnel to courts-martial. Individuals not subject to military orders are not an “important” part of the military “machinery” that depends on swift military justice to maintain good order and discipline. McElroy v. United States ex rel. Guagliardo, 361 U.S. 281, 285 (1960) (quoting Ex parte Reed, 100 U.S. 13, 21–22 (1879)).

Although the duty to obey military orders is a necessary condition for court-martial jurisdiction, it does not follow that the possibility of a recall order is sufficient to subject members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve to such jurisdiction. If the military issues an order recalling one or more members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve, they will be reincorporated into the military chain of command and subject to military discipline and court-martial. But until then, their day-to-day lives are equivalent to those of ordinary civilians. No need to take my word for it. Ask the military, which routinely excludes the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve from the requirements it deems necessary to maintain the armed forces. Members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve are unassigned to a specific command, are ineligible for promotion, lack authority to issue binding orders, may refer to their rank and wear their uniforms only under limited conditions, need not participate in military activities, need not maintain any level of physical fitness, and may not serve on or refer charges to courts-martial. And especially significant, although the Marine Corps requires all “active and reserve component” members to be vaccinated against COVID-19 because “a fully vaccinated force is a matter of operational readiness and good order and discipline,” it has not extended this requirement to members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve. See MARADMINS 462/21 (Sept. 1, 2021) (first quote); MARADMINS 612/21 (Oct. 23, 2021) (second quote). The military itself obviously considers the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve to lie outside the “force” where “good order and discipline” are essential.

A recall order, then, functions as a gateway to military status. The possibility of such an order certainly means that the military status of members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve could change, but not that they are currently part of the armed forces. Before receiving any such order, they are entitled to all jury rights guaranteed by the Constitution. “It is impossible to think that the discipline of the [Marine Corps] is going to be disrupted, its morale impaired, or its orderly processes disturbed” by providing members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve with an Article III jury trial. Toth, 350 U.S. at 22.

Neither English nor American history requires otherwise. Like our Supreme Court, Blackstone observed that “[t]he necessity of order and discipline in an army is the only thing which can give [court-martial jurisdiction] countenance.” 1 William Blackstone, Commentaries *400. The Founders so resented Britain’s curtailment of the right to jury trial that military tribunals received special condemnation in the Declaration of Independence, which denounced King George III’s efforts “to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil power” and chastised the Crown “[f]or depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of trial by jury.” The Declaration of Independence para. 2 (U.S. 1776). Moreover, regardless of the turbid history of how individuals like members of the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve were treated prior to 1789, see Majority Op. at 18–24, the Constitution enshrined the right to trial by jury and curtailed the scope of courts-martial. In sum, our history reveals a “deeply rooted and ancient opposition . . . to the extension of military control over civilians.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 33.

The implications of this case stretch far beyond Larrabee and the Fleet Marine Corps Reserve. Millions of military retirees are also subject to military recall. 10 U.S.C. § 688(b). Indeed, as Larrabee’s counsel pointed out at oral argument, under the court’s reasoning “nothing would stop the Government from court-martialing a 90-year-old Korean War veteran, who retired after being injured in the war, for shoplifting a newspaper from his local supermarket.” Oral Arg. 33:55–34:10. The 200-plus retired generals and admirals who spoke out against President Trump and the 120-plus now speaking out against President Biden could likewise be court-martialed. See 10 U.S.C. § 888 (subjecting military officers to court-martial for “us[ing] contemptuous words against the President”); Br. for Joshua E. Kastenberg & J. Wesley Moore as Amicus Curiae in Support of Appellee at 22–23.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly warned of the dangers of expanding court-martial jurisdiction. “Every extension of military jurisdiction is an encroachment on the jurisdiction of the civil courts, and, more important, acts as a deprivation of the right to jury trial and of other treasured constitutional protections.” Covert, 354 U.S. at 21; see also Toth, 350 U.S. at 15 (“[A]ny expansion of court-martial jurisdiction . . . necessarily encroaches on the jurisdiction of federal courts . . . where persons on trial are surrounded with more constitutional safeguards than in military tribunals.”). As a result of today’s decision, millions of Americans have lost one such constitutional right.
